About this Project...

▶ Target: £4,760 / €5,470 | Project 393

Finding a job is difficult for young people in Myanmar (also known as Burma), especially for those who've had to leave education early because their families could not afford school fees. For this reason, the Diocese of Toungoo and Sittwe have launched a scheme to provide vocational training for young people, especially for those from deprived backgrounds.

These dioceses are offering a range of vocational courses, including mechanics, electrics, carpentry, food preservation and English language. Skills training will provide job seekers with confidence as well as boosting their chances of developing a career.

Learning English is particularly important. English is needed for university education and is increasingly seen as desirable by employers. To this end the diocese has opened an English language centre, through which 575 students have already completed courses of varying levels. Money donated to this Project will enable these Dioceses to continue running these courses, through which disadvantaged young people are finding jobs and a route out of poverty.

Project supporters will receive three newsletters a year and other resources to help promote your Project
